

I do not think onboard electronic devices would adequately address the driver health/fatigue issue. Most pressure to do extra work involves nondriving chores. The devices would show only the truck stopped, not what the driver is actually doing when the truck is stopped. Nondriving work pays little or nothing to the driver but adds fatigue because carriers pressure drivers NOT to log these items, thus showing more log hours available to drive.